VERA GWINNE, TELEPHONE 4599

A great many men and women would be willing to add a decade to their actual years and then ten years younger than they are, just to have more time to be concerned about the quality of their lives.

Such desires spring from vanity rather than good judgment, of course, but to relate one's youthful appearance in a natural manner is to humanize a very tangible asset. For the only natural way of regenerating the physical appearance is by developing a high degree of health, and to the individual who possess perfect health, there is no such thing as an arbitrary limitation of years.

Of course, beauty folk die eventually, just as do really sick men and women. But they do not exhibit any great basic change.

It would not be satisfied with merely striving to look young, determine to be young. It is not a bit more difficult—and far more profitable. The one benefit that outranks all things that come with the healthy, vigorous body, the wholesome, ruddy countenance and the keen, virile brain, is the certainty that the methods that make for that health and consciousness tend also to enable one to make a truly earthly stay a long and useful life.

There is a substantial satisfaction in the possession of health, strength and activity, and the power in steady nerves and those are the most important insurance imaginable against wear and concern as to the duration of one's existence. To go further, one enjoying health of the vibrant persuading sort need have no fear as to the length of the days he has passed on this earth or the prospects of their future continuance.

Honor thy body and thy days will be long in the land—Bernard MacPadden in "Physical Culture."
